

Crayon Resist- Using Art for Teaching

You will prepare a white paper before class by drawing or writing something on it with a white crayon. Nothing is visible to the children at first but your hidden drawing will begin to appear when you apply paint to the white paper.

This is a simple idea for teaching or artwork and it can be adapted to any lesson or subject.

Materials:

- White paper
- White crayon (or a white candle will work too).
- Paint (Use water based paint. Tempera paint works well with children because it is washable, but any water-based paint like acrylic will do.)
- Paint brush or sponge to apply the paint.
- Tissue to wipe away excess paint.

Preparation:

1. Plan the picture or writing.
2. Before class, use the white crayon or candle to draw a picture or words on the white paper. Because this is white crayon on white paper, the paper will look blank.

Instructions:

1. Have the children use a paint brush or sponge to apply the paint to the white paper.
2. The paint will soak into the paper but not into the parts covered in wax. Whatever you have drawn with the white crayon will “appear” as you apply the paint.

Helpful Hints:

- You can use a black pen to do the writing or drawing first and then place the blank white paper over it and trace it.
- Prepare this in sunlight or near a lamp. The wax reflects in the light, so you can see the drawing more easily.
- Apply the paint to some blank areas before you reveal the picture. Kids love surprises, so draw out the suspense a little.
- Experiment with the paint beforehand so it won't be too thick or too thin.

Adaptations:
